A CHILLING PAST

It was a dark and gloomy day, this September 13, 1896. Henry Wood and General Samuel Miller rode in the carriage with the horses being controlled by their young companion and Henry's intern, Jacob Baker, who was eagerly trying to join the Jaxton News station that Henry wrote for. There was a mist scouring the air that caused their visuals to be grey and hazy.

Henry was looking over his journal, examining the notes he had taken during his study of recent events taking place in Hegis. He was worried and had an awful feeling in his gut.

While wallowing in thought, Gen. Miller interrupted, "Are you still worried, Henry?"

Henry looked at the sergeant, concern evident in his eyes, and replied, "What if we don't survive this, General?"
